We investigated the effects of calcium and pyrophosphate on the formation of calcium pyrophosphate dihydrate (CPPD) crystals by culturing chondrocytes in a medium containing high concentrations of calcium and pyrophosphate. The calcification of the crystals was examined quantitatively by laser diffraction and image analysis. Cultures with normal and calcium free medium served as control. The calcium and pyrophosphate concentrations required for calcification were 29.0 and 10.0 mM, respectively. Cultures containing both calcium and pyrophosphate showed faster calcification of CPPD crystals than cultures with either single ingredient. Calcium and pyrophosphate induced an increase in the average size of the crystals; the effect of calcium was more pronounced. The addition of 10 mM Na2HPO4, a pyrophosphate precursor, in calcium pyrophosphate medium reduced the crystal size. Bisphosphonates added to calcium pyrophosphate medium also reduced the average crystal size. The addition of alpha-cyclodextrin, a pyrophosphate complexing agent, in calcium pyrophosphate medium increased the rate of 570a42141b
