This is an image of a guy who died in South Africa at the age of 34. He left behind a crack on the window of a car which had been "hacked" to look like a message written by "Snow"¹, and a number of articles proclaiming it was his message as well. It is truly unknown to us if he was even alive, or if he was the one who "Snow" was talking about. It's only known because of the internet. All that to say, this was a "hacked" car. Recently it was reported that the car's owner gave an interview about this car, and although he was always skeptical that it was really Snow's, he said it was still something he wasn't aware of when he bought the car. Some sites claim that they know the guy is dead, but unless they can prove it, it's hard to say. They say that the car was sold to a previous owner who "hacked" it to say "Snow is coming" by unscrewing the headlight, and screwing it back in at a different angle.^{2,3}

Green Hornet The Matrix Online Full Game Hex 1.3 Wimbledon Prologue Wily young Phan: Prologue on the road Die Young: PrologueQ: Creating a list from a column using for loops? I'm trying to create a list using for loops in Python, but each time I try, I get a ValueError saying that the indices must be integers or slices, not list. I have a series of data frames that look like this: [Name] [Level] [Year] I want to go through each of the data frames and find the maximum Year value per level, so the final list would look like this: [MaxYear] [MaxLevel] I've been trying to do something like this: for fname in basename: data = {} for line in basename: if line.Year == "": print(fname, " is missing a year value") elif line.Year == fname.MaxYear: print(fname, " is missing a year value") else: data.update({line.Name:line.Year}) print(fname, " has " + line.Year + " as the highest year") But that doesn't work, I get TypeError: '_io.TextIOWrapper' object is not callable. A: It's a good idea to include a filename in the basename variable as this can come in handy if you need to reassign a different file to the loop, or to clean up the output. Something like this should work: import glob import pandas as pd basename = "sorted.csv"
