Billionaire hedge fund manager Leon Cooperman is in negotiations to acquire significant stakes in videogame companies Oculus and Wargaming from its existing shareholders, the Financial Times reported on Friday. Citing multiple anonymous sources, the report says Cooperman is approaching smaller tech investors and big names in gaming to purchase stakes in Oculus VR and Wargaming.com, with Oculus getting between $250 million and $1 billion. Oculus is working on a new "virtual reality" headset, while Wargaming.com is developing a new kind of MMO game. "We've been in contact with people who may have interests in acquiring Oculus, and we'll be reaching out to a wider set of people," Cooperman told the paper, adding that he will not be involved in developing any games. He said he will merely invest in the companies. Oculus VR CEO Brendan Iribe said his company is "in active talks with several parties as we look to take this fantastic company to the next level. We're having deep conversations with multiple parties and are pleased with the level of interest we're receiving." Wargaming CEO Victor Kislyi has not been reached for comment. Oculus had a valuation of $1.6 billion in its most recent private funding round, which was done in January.
