Peak Climbing ----- Yoruba speakers living in Enugu, Nigeria, have been shown to have significantly different patterns of genetic variation than an African American population from Baltimore, but not so dissimilar to other Yoruba groups (Southwest, Northeast, and Benin) suggesting that they are a distinct subpopulation within this broad geographic area [pone.0003592-Bigham1]. We have been able to show that a significant proportion of the gene variation within the Yoruba in Nigeria is associated with geography. While other global populations have a much lower proportion, Yoruba is still larger than many but not all geographically stratified groups. The Nigerian Yoruba cluster is clearly related to a specific region. In North America, several groups, like the French Canadians, display as much or more continental structure than the Yoruba. Signatures of population movements of course will have a significant effect in modifying the structure of the mitochondrial and Y chromosomes. This is reflected in the fact that the Y is found to have much less variation in parts of Africa than in other populations [pone.0003592-Bigham1], [pone.0003592-Lao1], [pone.0003592-Mishmar1]. This difference could be due to a founder effect on a small portion of the X chromosome [pone.0003592-Perelle1]. Recent demographic history is commonly assumed to have a major impact on a genome, but is difficult to detect because of the large timescale over which population diversity is generated (e.g. [pone.0003592-Tishkoff1], [pone.0003592-Lao1]). Thus, there are clear differences between our data and the genome-wide data. These differences may be due to the different assumptions of underlying demographic history in the two approaches. In our approach, the population structure is represented by markers and is assumed to be correlated with historical structure. Thus, differences between our data and those from genome-wide data are most likely due to the different nature of the data and its structure. We detect a significant geographic effect on the genome that is independent of the genealogy of the different regions. This observation is consistent with a recent study of a multi-ethnic group of Jerusalemis,

The aim of the presented study was to evaluate sodium, potassium, chloride blood serum and urine concentrations in BPH (benign prostatic hypertrophy) patients in comparison to healthy persons. The study comprised 42 BPH patients, mean age 65 years, 31-76 years. All were examined clinically and biochemically. The examined BPH patients' complaints included: lower urinary tract symptoms, urinary symptoms, and a number of urinary infection episodes, which were treated pharmacologically. The control group consisted of 16 healthy persons, mean age 63 years, 29-73 years. In the

BPH group the blood serum sodium was significantly lower in comparison to the control group. The potassium concentration was significantly lower in the examined BPH patients than in the control group. The chloride concentration in the blood serum was significantly higher, and the urine chloride concentration was significantly lower than in the control group. There were no differences in the blood and urine sodium, potassium, and chloride concentrations between BPH patients of a hypertensive, diabetic, and a cardiological etiology. There was no correlation between the blood sodium, potassium, chloride concentration, and the serum
