Over a quarter of a century ago, Smith and Blow discovered that ribonuclease (RNase) could be classified on the basis of a common property, rather than by phylogenetic criteria alone. They organized this concept, known as the metal protein superfamily (MPS), on the basis of chemistry, and provided no clue about how this concept might have relevance to the biological function of RNase. Despite the apparent lack of biologic connection, the MPS has developed into one of the most intriguing areas of biological research. This review examines how the concept of MPS has been applied in a variety of domains, including structure/function, evolutionary relationships, phylogenetic classification, and biocatalytic properties. Although the chemical mechanisms of the RNases are now well established, the focus is here on the biological consequences of the presence of a metal ion in the RNase active site. The general principles of function, such as cleavage at U, G, or A, in which the function is enhanced or modified by the presence of a metal ion, can be used for the development of more efficient ribonucleases. The development of highly enantioselective nucleases will be discussed as a useful example of how this can be done. { out++ = ' '; } if (parsed == 0) { / but we should still check for nested parens */ if (starts_with_paren) { 6d1f23a050
