Additional menu Aikido and the Global On Wednesday I was in Japan for the first time and I took the opportunity for a photo-shoot in the Budo studio of Aikido Japan. This is the studio where they train. It was a bit surreal to be in a studio that is basically one of the most famous studios in the world and it is literally down the road from Taito. The studio is part of the All Japan Aikido Federation and the aikido they practice is a mixture of both Ueshiba's teachings, along with other Japanese arts. Their approach to the study of aikido is really interesting, which I will get to in a little bit. I will also have a few videos at the end of this post. Now I have been reading various resources in preparation of this trip and have come across some interesting things to share with you and talk about. It's always good to share different ideas and thoughts to get the brain moving. So read on. There are things to share and things to learn as we explore aikido and the global. Aikido First, I would like to say that the global is defined as the world we live in and sometimes I consider it the world we create. A few things I've come across about Aikido in Japan today include: 1) There are many Aikido schools still that practice Ueshiba's original forms of Aikido, very few in the US. It's also very rare in the US to find people practicing the original art of Aikido, it's very trendy to practice Aikido mixed with other arts. It's really interesting to see an old man like Ueshiba being placed under the spotlight as a global hero. 2) In the US we have the Iain Abernethy group and traditional forms of aik
