a framework was introduced for high-performance parallel computation to compose modular algorithms where each module may be evaluated on up to one of the available cores. this framework is efficiently realized in openmp on multiple lock-free data structures. we developed several variants of this framework, one of which used lock-free arrays to parallelize the cell predecessor algorithm (cpol2). cpol2 is well known to be complex to parallelize, but the lock-free variant was surprisingly simple. this is because each thread “knows” about its “own” cell. in contrast, the lock-based version requires each thread to periodically copy data back and forth between cells. our simulator suite demonstrated the lock-free variant to perform up to 8.5 times faster. using the simulator suite, we demonstrate omp-cpol2 for applications spanning graph operations to unit-vector multiplication. sudarsan guha are among those who explore the power of lamport’s multi-version concurrency control, boost which is highly used and tested in the c++ community. they have written several implementation of boost.multiindex sudarsan guha was involved in the zero confusion computing (z3) project with its main idea is to provide a modular, portable, trustworthy, and easy to use, program-analysis tool. z3 is a multi-threaded program analysis framework, based on the ideas from the zeromq network protocol. z3 is available as a library but also easily fit in a compiler.
