how many of you have heard of the danger of putting the wrong password on the wireless router, and when youve got all the right settings and your password isn't the one you thought it was, theres a big fat blue light on the device. most people just dont care, and think nothing of entering the wrong password for a period of time, if theyve got the right vpn software. the problem with this is that the router is now broadcasting your ip address, and with the right software, you can see everyone who has access to it. since this is a free country, and you need to get out of your apartment (if thats where you live), why not just go to a hotel or a friend's house and use their wireless connection. why would anyone make a movie like this, when the competition is so bad? well, the competition is bad, because the studios are locked out of the distribution channels (they need a distributor who has the distribution channels) and are desperate. if they had the distribution channels, then they could bypass these big-name movie stars to cast those parts, and distribute the movies themselves. if they had the distribution channels, then they could bypass the hollywood marketing machine, and just cast a movie and get it out there. if they had the distribution channels, then they could bypass the international distribution channels and just cast a movie and get it out there. the way they do it now, is by resorting to all of these tactics, including a movie like this. its a tired, old, tried-and-true way of getting money from people. the 'personalized approach' is going to be the only way to make money, until people figure out that they can buy the license for it, and that it will be a great investment. this 'personalized approach' is going to be the only way to make money until the 'personalized approach' is the only way to make money. the only way to make money is to license out the personalized approach. youre not going to be able to make money selling movies that are of low quality and low value unless the market demands it. if you think that all of this is going to go away because of a few big-name actors, youre wrong. the market will dictate that this will be a continually growing business, and the big-name actors will just be the ones who are controlling the market at this point.

While I dont think that the solution is a total Internet ban (the entire concept of copyright is worthless without any means to enforce it), I do think that more measures should be introduced that work towards closing down the largest avenues of massive online copyright infringement and that should include measures to maintain the status quo for peer to peer applications. As a point of clarification, I do not buy music via peer to peer applications, I download via BitTorrent and use the Squeezebox to play it.

Although there is huge evidence against this, I think that I can predict where its all going, and its not towards anything good for the consumer. Lets take the example of the music industry of the 80s, what happened in 1988 was that the record industry thought they had dug themselves a hole that they would never get out of, so they tried to halt the growth of the Internet through measures such as the Digital Millenium Copyright Act.

They failed, the real world works differently to the abstract one in the head of a record industry lobbyist, and soon all the people who wanted to buy music online simply went to the store, bypassing the middle man and the industry had to change to survive. Similarly with movies, once we have mastered the art of instantaneous delivery of massive amounts of content, then its game over for the big DVD rental companies and physical sales will be relegated to a novelty item for the elderly. The problem for the industry is that the millennial generation will never put up with such things, and they already have a taste for magic shows, free access to information and open source software on their computers. They will never put up with the inefficient system of large corporations and monopolies owned by people who are too rich to care or are simply stupid. Theres a joke in this connection, often attributed to Baryshnikov, that says that all you need to have is one original idea in the world, and the problems disappear. Of course thats not true, because theres always the equivalent of a hidden hand involved in the piracy, but its easy to see that theres something of the truth in it. Theres a movie in there somewhere and if Big

Content doesnt do something about it, someone else will. 5ec8ef588b
