I was wondering if I should have someone else do it since this is a rather sensitive position. I should also mention that I've never seen the person in question in this position and that our group has a more than a 20+ year history of publishing. I don't know much about any past disputes the person may have had with others, and I've never seen anyone in this position in the past. What's your best advice for a situation like this? A: Most comments on the topic note the need for respect, etc., but in the end it is not a question of what is right and what is wrong but a matter of process. You can ask yourself whether it is your responsibility to referee. If you think that it is then you are duty bound to observe the procedure and not let an individual be a judge of his own case. You need to give the publisher the benefit of the doubt unless there is a clear case of unfairness. Any subsequent complaints are a matter for the publisher to handle in case of grievances. If you feel like the process should be different and that the matter is your responsibility, then you should be quick to apply the proper process. Do not be too quick or your word might not mean much. In any case, you can always avoid an awkward situation by just not taking it on. A: Now that you have been asked by the
