I've tested it by logging the throughput and the Android device isn't even close to any other DB application I've used and still manages to "do it all". Now I'm in the process of optimising it and i'm curious about the SQLite performance on Android. My idea is to retrieve small pieces of the database as they are needed and to transfer them to the phone asynchronously so that the user doesn't notice any lag in the application. I'm not trying to save big chunks of data to the phone or anything. Now my concern is that the SQLite database is located on the phone's internal memory and that it's not synchronized with the source. Meaning that I might not be able to guarantee that I have the latest file (or a few files) at all times, the way it's done on the source code. I'm curious about this, is there anything that can be done about it? Is there a "really good" way to transfer files that is done in a way that doesn't slow down the database access while it's happening? It's not a big concern (or even a concern at all) for small files, but what about large files (let's say 500 bytes or larger)? Let's assume that this is not a concern at all and for the sake of argument that the SQLite library has no problem accessing the right file on the phone, what is the maximum rate that the device can access the file
