We have a web app that uses the web service. The web service is being used by another web app. The web service occasionally throws an error stating that an.exe or a dll(sometimes.dll) is missing. I checked if the required dll or exe exists, but this is always false. Although when I try copying the exe/dll in the bin folder of the web app and restarting IIS. The error is always gone. So I wondered why is IIS reloading it every time I am changing it's properties? I do not have any event handlers on the application in question as the nature of that web app is such that it doesn't need any. A: Does your web app run as Network Service (NetSvc)? If so, it's no longer a local AppDomain with the full trust level - it's run as an impersonated user (usually NETWORK SERVICE) with no unusual permissions and lots of security. Therefore it's normal to have a web app that runs well in this environment, but when you change your IIS settings (e.g. to install an EXE in a web app's bin directory), the EXE gets a security failure because it's in a domain that doesn't have the same privileges. Actually, if you look at the error, it's normal - it's complaining that the domain doesn't have the privileges that it needs, not a security failure - the AppDomain represents the context that it had in the previous run, not a static security context. It's a subtle thing, not sure why it might be confusing you. If this is the case, I'm not sure what to suggest you do - there's a limit to what can be done when the EXE's are in IIS without the EXE being run as Network Service (the solution is to run the EXE as Network Service).
