following recombinant adeno-associated virus-mediated dopamine receptor-2 gene transfer and bromocriptine treatment in rats with amphetamine-induced lesions. The effects of transgene expression and subsequent, long-term treatment with bromocriptine (BROM) on behavioral and neurochemical parameters of dopaminergic function were studied in rats with unilateral amphetamine-induced lesions of the 6-hydroxydopamine (6-OHDA) nigrostriatal pathway. Seven days after surgery, AAV(5)-DAR2 (DA receptor-2) was injected into the nigrostriatal pathway, and rats were given BROM (0.2-5 mg/kg s.c.) twice daily. Four weeks after viral administration, amphetamine (2.5 mg/kg i.p., 12 h) caused a significant increase in the apomorphine (APO) stereotypic circling behavior of the treated side that was still evident after 3 months. BROM reduced this amphetamine-induced circling behavior in a dose-dependent manner. The major effect of BROM was on behavioral sensitivity to amphetamine. Treatment with AAV5-DAR2 and BROM was associated with elevated striatal levels of dopaminergic transporters and receptors, as well as elevated DA concentrations in the striata of drug-treated rats. In the nucleus accumbens (NAc), levels of the DA transporter, DAT, and the D1/D5-DA receptors were elevated in all treated groups. In addition, DAR2 over-expression was associated with increased levels of the DA-synthesizing enzyme, TH, in the ipsilateral nucleus accumbens. BROM treatment decreased levels of DA in the NAc of all DAR2-expressing groups. This BROM effect on DA levels was associated with increased TH levels in the nigrostriatal pathway of drug-treated but not DAR2-expressing rats. Hepatic levels of DA in DAR2-gene-expressing rats were unaffected by BROM, suggesting that the increased amount of striatal DA is primarily attributable to transgene expression in the striata of DAR2-transfected animals.
